Description:

Review Michael Nir has written a very good primer on communication skills for leaders and managers. I enjoyed his analogy to backpacking in Denali National Park, which I have personally visited. He has a dry sense of humor with lines like "...the natural urge to pet [bears] is highly inadvisable.

I liked his focus on personal informal power with spot on tips for communication styles to affect greater informal power. He makes a valid point that most organizations go to an extreme level to avoid using the "liking" influencing strategy. The result is a dead organization devoid of acknowledgment and recognition. The end product is a group of cohorts that avoid liking each other and many times don't.

Michael's greatest contribution in this book is the inventory of 20 leading characteristics found in global business leaders. I wonder if we should do more screening for these indicators like fairness, vision, humility, trust and the others. All in all, a good, quick read to help leaders and managers with communication skills development.
